My experience with the other work of the director is, as usual, as usual, as usual, as usual limited, but it is still not Shake that persistent expectation that I would love to love about it, but my thanks for the movie can it will be described as an admiration instead of affection, and, although I can speak only with the older praised by the achievement of Tarkovsky, it does not occupy that exclusive space near my heart. There are other points of contact and contrast between the two movies. Directed by Andrei Rublev faced doubts about whether or not, having sinned, he could continue his iconographic icon, also I am in two minds on the movie Andrei Tarkovsky. Obviously, Vladimir's assault on a tart, obviously, was supposed to be the centerpiece of the image, but Tarkovsky depends on each detail to such an extent that the "chaos" finally ends up in an established conflict. In retrospect, you should probably have sustained it for longer and acquired the DVD of the collection of criteria, which restores the image to its four-hour glory. Although RUBLEV is a monk, Tarkovsky takes it out of the monastery, confronting it with the hard and disturbing realities of the world in which he lives. Even before its launch, the director had already expressed interest in filming the life of the great Russian icon Andrei Rublev, although very little is known about him. Neither biography nor historiography. Andrei Rublev is a collection of only related episodes that touch the crises of faith, brutality and chaos, and finally the artist's response and the believer. What is the point or place of art in such a world? A consequence of this narrative format is the lack of cohesion in the narration of Tarkovsky.
